

Interview with members of the 294th Bomb Group, 2003 (SA268)

I was quite surprised at first, at night, one of the first nights we were there, where you could see the number of searchlights around. Everything seemed to be searching for something. They weren't necessary our field, but it gave you an idea of what was going on somewhere else.

Also, we got quite aware of the little blimps with the cables, you know, to keep the Germans from coming through, those things would be suspended up at a certain altitude, and you had to be careful you didn't fly into those accidentally and get wound up.

Also, I got quite tired of eating orange marmalade. Seemed like we had orange marmalade for pancakes, for bread, everything under the sun. So I haven't liked orange marmalade since.
